Let's Honor Her Life

and the Courage of All Like Her

The tears still involuntarily flow at the thought of Michelle's passing; but from the pool of tears has come a mission of service to make it better for others touched by this unrelenting disease. Family, friends, and the community have come together and created a mission to serve our community. Her parents say that more than once they have wished the treatment would have started sooner. But bitter disappointment has been replaced with positive action. Michelle needed a resource center where she could go for help in coping with her challenges. Her parents, family, and friends have started one in her memory so others will have an opportunity to get the help they need. It is called Michelle's Place.

Michelle felt she would have liked a place where she could have received emotional comfort, a listening ear, and an opportunity to talk to someone who is surviving breast cancer and learning to cope with the disease. This place should also provide the latest information regarding treatment options, coping strategies as well as information on the latest research and clinical developments so the person and their family can help in planning and be informed when making treatment decisions.

Michelle shared a love of life and persevered to the end with valiant determination to beat the challenge of breast cancer. She always shared her knowledge and experience of battling cancer in a positive, and uplifting way. Although her journey on earth was cut short, her vision of helping others with breast cancer was the inspiration to open Michelle's Place to assist those walking a similar path.

Especially important at Michelle's Place is the provision of education to those women not yet touched by the disease. They must know that if a lesion is mammographically detected during the early development state, chances of survival and/or a cure rate is raised to a dramatic 95% or more. This is a major improvement over today's variable survival rates among ethnic groups ranging from 55% to 79% because, like Michelle, many of them are discovering breast cancer too late. It is clear that a very high priority for Michelle's Place is to help educate everyone in our community, from our young women to seniors.

A word of thanks from a Michelle's Place client

"I wanted to express my heart to all of you at Michelle's Place. You have brought so much information and care upon me during my journey with breast cancer. But most of all your love has poured out, bringing so much joy and happiness. Through phone calls of support, the dressing room for "new" fittings and the temporary financial assistance, you have brought huge relief! Bless you!"

Becca, 30 years old.
